Brief Plot Summary

The Magic Paper tells the story of Teresa Garcia and Benito Cruz, two Mexican-Americans. In 1980 Teresa buys a fake visa and comes alone to Los Angeles to care for her sick aunt. Then she stays, working in a dress factory to send money home to Mexico. Benito crawls through a pipe into California, where he works as a migrant farmworker. They meet and fall in love. Benito moves to Los Angeles and works in a factory. They want to marry, but they can't because they are illegal. They work hard and save money to go to Mexico and bring Teresa's sister back. Finally they have enough money, but when they go to Mexico City there is a great earthquake. Teresa's whole family is killed. They come back to the U.S. illegally. They continue to work hard, and wait until a new law lets them apply to get the magic paper, to become legal, and to get married. At last, they feel safe.

The Magic Paper

Detailed Plot Summary

While Teresa Garcia waits in line in Mexico City for a tourist visa, a man approaches her offering to sell her a visa because, he says, she will never be able to get one otherwise. An hour later he returns with a visa. The next day Teresa takes a bus to Los Angeles to visit her Aunt Silvia and Uncle Ruben, who have permanent resident status (the “green card”) in the United States.

Comparing Los Angeles to Mexico City, Teresa sees how poor Mexico City is. She wants to make some money while she is here, so Uncle Ruben finds her work in a dress factory. Teresa does piecework 12 hours a day so she can send money home. When she develops a nasal condition from the factory air, she must stop working. She receives no sick pay. She admits to Aunt Silvia that she has overstayed her visa; maybe this would be a good time to return to Mexico City. Aunt Silvia insists that she stay until she is well.

When Teresa recovers she realizes she won't have a job back home. Uncle Ruben assures her that lots of people live here without green cards. Teresa finds a new job but says she will always be afraid of getting caught.

Back in a small, poor town in Mexico is a young man named Benito Cruz, who has crossed the border back and forth several times by various methods. No one in his hometown will give him a job, so he decides to try crossing again. As a truck is taking him toward the border, a policeman stops it and demands money to let it go on. At Tijuana, Benito pays a coyote to help him cross the border. The man leads him to a big pipe that runs under the ground. To get into California, Benito has to crawl through the wet, stinking, rat-infested pipe.

Benito gets work as a migrant farm worker. Some weekends he goes to Los Angeles with the other single men. One night a stranger offers, for $800, to find him an American wife so he can get his green card. The next Friday, the stranger brings Teresa to the bar and leaves with Benito's money. Benito and Teresa find each other attractive, but when he realizes she is an illegal, he is furious. He stamps out of the bar to go find the stranger who has bilked him.

Benito never finds the man, but he can't stop thinking about Teresa. He searches Los Angeles dress factories to find her. At last he locates her at her aunt and uncle's East Los Angeles apartment. Because the couple want to be near each other, Benito stays in Los Angeles and takes a job in a shirt factory.

Benito and Teresa want to marry but can't because they are illegals. Benito suggests they return to Mexico to marry and bring back Teresa's sister Raquel. Teresa is afraid to cross the border, so the couple continues living as invisibly as possible. Meanwhile, Teresa sends money orders home each week and keeps a record of the amounts.

When Teresa thinks she has sent enough money to bring Raquel to the United States, she waits for her sister to get a visa. Benito says that is naive and tells Teresa that her own visa was a fake. He says the only way to get Raquel here is to go and get her. So Teresa agrees to Benito's plan of going to Mexico and getting married while there, despite Aunt Silvia informing her of impending amnesty legislation that would allow illegal aliens to get green cards.

On their way to Mexico, Benito and Teresa learn there has been a terrible earthquake in Mexico City. They arrive to find the city a shambles and learn that Teresa's whole family has been killed. Sadly, and without marrying, they hitch a truck ride to cross the border back into the United States. Inside the dark truck are many people, some of them sick, and a bad odor hangs in the air. Just after crossing the border, the truck is stopped by a lone U.S. Border Patrol officer, who orders the people to wait until he returns with a bus to transport them back into Mexico. As soon as the bus is out of sight, the Teresa and Benito walk a mile back toward California and cross the border on foot. Teresa observes that the desert terrain is the same on both sides of the border.

Back in Los Angeles, Benito, unhappy with city life, returns to farm work. That fall, the amnesty law passes and Teresa goes to apply for her green card. She takes along her only proof that she has been in the United States since before 1982: her record of the money orders she sent to Mexico. Then she waits for two things: her green card and Benito. Both arrive on the same day. The couple can marry as soon as Benito gets his own "magic paper," and for the first time in seven years, Teresa feels safe.

The Magic Paper

Historical Background

Mexicans have been in the land that became the United States since 1541. In that year the explorer, Francisco Coronado, led an army of Spanish soldiers and Mexican Indian troops on an expedition in search of the legendary golden Seven Cities of Cibola. They went as far north as the area that would one day be called Kansas. Mexicans' Indian ancestors have lived all over the Southwest since then. Los Angeles was founded in 1781 by 44 Mexicans. Ever since, people have moved back and forth between the two lands. Indeed, the present border was not established until after the Mexican-American War of 1846. More than 600,000 people emigrated north during the Mexican Revolution of 1910-20, and Mexican labor has been vigorously imported in times of need, such as in American wartimes. Starting during World War II, a U.S. government program legally imported braceros (workers) until American labor unions pressured for an end to the program in 1964.

As immigration policies became more restricted, uncountable millions of Mexicans have crossed the border illegally. Mexicans cross the border by any imaginable method: across the Rio Grande, under barbed-wire fences, on foot out of sight of the relatively few Border Patrols, through sewage pipes, by bus or truck. Many of them cross back and forth regularly. The busiest crossing points are between Tijuana, Mexico, and Chula Vista, California, and between Juarez, Mexico, and El Paso, Texas. In addition, some 300,000 Mexicans legally hold permits to cross the border daily to work in the United States. Besides the many adventure stories of crossing the border, the situation has created a lucrative market for fake documentation and coyotes, the people who help Mexicans cross and find work for a fee.

This is an immigration problem of tremendous magnitude: how to manage a border between a very poor and a very affluent country. While the United States grapples with an understaffed Border Patrol, the American people debate the continuing moral dilemma of dealing with the poor-and rapidly growing-Mexican population just to the south. Meanwhile, American agribusiness has become reliant on low-paid migrant laborers, many of whom are illegal Mexican and Central American aliens.

A recent attempt at a remedy was the Immigration Reform Control Act of 1986 which, for a limited period of time, granted permanent resident status to illegal aliens who could prove they lived in the United States continuously since January 1, 1982, and to farm workers who had worked in the United States for at least 90 days during the year preceding May 1, 1986. (The law also made it illegal for employers to hire undocumented workers.) A lower-than-expected number of illegals responded to the amnesty program, partly because, having lived as invisibly as possible, they had no paper proof of their existence. Since 1986, as Mexicans in search of a better life continue to enter the United States illegally, the immigration question remains to be resolved.
